

This is an excellent position to be in. Getting positive responses from cold emails means your initial hook is working. Now, you need to transition from "intriguing stranger" to "authoritative expert."

Alex Hormozi's sales philosophy (outlined heavily in his books $100M Offers and $100M Leads, as well as his Acquisition.com training) revolves around The Grand Slam Offer: making an offer so good people feel stupid saying no. He emphasizes maintaining frame, selling the next step (not the whole service at once), and anchoring price to immense value.

Here is a detailed, step-by-step breakdown of how to run your B2B sales process—from that first positive email reply to the close—using Hormozi's principles, tailored specifically for selling AI tools to Solar and HVAC companies.

Phase 1: From Email Reply to the Call

When a prospect replies to a cold email, your only goal is to sell the call, not the AI software. If you try to explain features or pitch prices via email, you lose control and look desperate.

1. How to Communicate (The Tone)

- Be a Peer, Not a Beggar: Act like a busy doctor diagnosing a patient. You are evaluating them to see if they are a fit for your system.
- The "Takeaway": Introduce slight friction to show you aren't desperate.
- Keep it Short: Long emails scream desperation.

2. What to Say in the Reply

When they say, "Tell me more" or "I'm interested," respond with a low-friction call to action:

"Glad to hear it, [Name]. Honestly, I'm not sure if our AI qualification system is a fit for your specific [HVAC/Solar] setup yet. Do you have 10 minutes on Tuesday or Wednesday for a quick chat to see if it even makes sense to keep talking?"

3. How to Handle "Just send me the price" via Email

Never give the price via cold email. Without the context of value, price is just an expense. If they push for price before a call, use Hormozi's value-anchoring pivot:

"Pricing depends entirely on your current lead volume and how many systems we need to integrate with. However, we operate on a strictly ROI-positive basis (e.g., if we don't save your reps 20 hours a week and book 10 extra installs, you don't pay). Are you open to a quick 10-min call to see if we can actually deliver that for you?"

Phase 2: The Call & Communicating Price

Hormozi is adamant that closing happens on the phone or Zoom, not in an inbox.

1. The Call Structure (The "Closer" Framework)

- Clarify: "Why did you take this call today?"
- Label: Identify their current pain (e.g., "So your guys are wasting hours driving to unqualified solar leads?").
- Overview: Pitch the Dream Outcome. Don't talk about LLMs, Python, or API integrations. Talk about: "A system that answers every customer text in 3 seconds, pre-qualifies their roof for solar, and books the appointment on your calendar automatically."
- Sell the Vacation, Not the Flight: They don't care how the AI works; they care about closed deals and saved time.

2. When and How to Say the Price

Say the price at the very end of the call, right after you have "stacked" the value and explained your risk-reversal (guarantee).

1. Stack the Value: "You get the 24/7 AI secretary, the calendar integration, and the SMS follow-up sequence."
2. The Guarantee: "And like I said, if we don't generate at least X qualified appointments in your first 30 days, we work for free until we do."
3. The Drop: "The investment to get this set up and running is $X."
4. The Golden Rule: SHUT UP. Do not say a single word after you drop the price. Let the silence hang. Whoever speaks next loses the negotiation. Let them process it.

Phase 3: The Proposal & Closing Strategy

1. The "Anti-Proposal" Rule

Hormozi strongly advises against the standard B2B "send a proposal and wait" routine. When you send a proposal for them to "think about," the momentum dies, and you lose leverage.

2. If You Must Have a Proposal

- Do it Live: Pull up the proposal or agreement while on the Zoom call. Walk through it together.
- Collect Cash on the Call: "Does everything look good? Great. I'll send the DocuSign right now in the chat, and we can take care of the onboarding deposit while we're here to get your kickoff scheduled."
- If forced to send async: If they absolutely mandate an emailed proposal for a partner to review, do not send it without booking the follow-up call first.
 - Wrong: "Here is the proposal, let me know what you think."
 - Right: "I will draft this up today. Let's put 10 minutes on the calendar for Thursday at 2 PM to walk through it together with your partner so I can answer any technical questions."

Phase 4: The Follow-Up Strategy

If they ghost you after the proposal or a call, adopt the "Follow up until they buy or die" mentality, but do it elegantly.

How Many Follow-Ups?

As many as it takes. Hormozi notes that most sales happen between the 5th and 12th contact. You space them out over time (Day 2, Day 4, Day 7, Day 14, Day 30, and then monthly).

What to Send (The Cadence)

1. The Value-Add Email (Show, Don't Tell)

Don't just ask "Just checking in." Send them proof.

"Hey [Name], we just rolled out a similar AI qualification tool for an HVAC guy in Texas. It disqualified 40 tire-kickers last week and booked 12 solid high-ticket replacement jobs. Thought of you. Let me know when you want to get yours up and running."

2. The Scarcity/Urgency Email

Hormozi relies heavily on real scarcity.

"Hey [Name], we are onboarding 3 new solar installers next week and our tech team is capping our bandwidth for the month to ensure quality. If you want to get the AI secretary live before the summer rush, we need to finalize the agreement by Friday. Let me know."

3. The 9-Word Email (The Dean Jackson special, popularized by many direct responders)

Extremely short, designed only to elicit a yes/no response.

"Subject: [Company Name] AI"

"Are you still looking to automate your lead qualification this month?"

4. The "Takeaway" or Break-Up Email

If they have ghosted you for weeks, pull the offer away. People want what they can't have.

"Hey [Name], I haven't heard back from you, so I'm assuming getting these leads automated isn't a priority right now. I'm going to close out your file so we can focus on our current clients. If things change, feel free to reach out."

(Watch how fast they reply to this one).

Summary Checklist for Your Campaign

- Goal of cold reply: Book the 10-min triage/discovery call.
- Goal of triage call: Book the closing call (or pitch immediately if they are ready).
- Pitching: Pitch the outcome (booked solar/HVAC jobs), not the vehicle (AI).
- Price: State it confidently at the end of the call, followed by total silence.
- Proposals: Review them live on the call.
- Follow-ups: Mix case studies, urgency, and direct questions. Never apologize for following up.

You have a highly valuable, highly scalable offer. If you truly believe your AI tools will make these contractors more money, your follow-up isn't annoying—it's your duty to help them out of their current inefficient processes.

What is the biggest objection you've been getting from these tradesmen when you do manage to get them on the phone?

How to sell like alex hormozi

This comprehensive guide details the sales philosophies, frameworks, and tactical scripts shared across the provided sources. The material emphasizes that high-ticket sales are not about "pitching" but about coaching, breaking beliefs, and maintaining control through strategic questioning.

I. The Core Philosophy: Coaching vs. Teaching

The sources establish a fundamental distinction between teaching and coaching in a sales context. In complex, high-level business deals, the salesperson must act as a business consultant with a high level of expertise.

- The Teaching Trap: Many salespeople fail by trying to educate the prospect before a sale is made. Prospects rarely listen to or implement advice until they have financially committed. Furthermore, only about 10% of people benefit from tactical advice, whereas 100% benefit from having their limiting beliefs broken.
- The Power of Coaching: Coaching involves using a question-based framework to lead the prospect to their own conclusions. The goal is to get the person to realize they need help to solve their problem, rather than feeling forced or suggested into a decision.
- Belief Breaking: For a prospect to take action, their current beliefs must be broken. If a salesperson simply provides tactics, the prospect may take notes and leave without buying, believing they can do it themselves, only to fail later. By questioning their beliefs, you provide value regardless of whether they buy.

II. The Three Essential Types of Sales Statements

In a professional sales conversation, only three types of statements should be used to guide the prospect toward a "yes".

1. Questions: This is the primary tool. Leading questions help discover the prospect's struggles, goals, and why previous attempts failed. They are the only way to get a person to change their mind without feeling attacked.
2. Restatements: After a prospect speaks, the salesperson repeats the core message back to them. This confirms active listening and ensures the salesperson has the correct context. For example: "So what I'm hearing is this is the primary issue you've been trying to solve... does that sound about right?".
3. Short Stories and Analogies: Instead of using "technobabble"—explaining the intricacies of software, periodization, or specific plans—salespeople should use analogies to illustrate the result.
 - The Fishing Analogy: If selling a marketing service, explain that the prospect won't be free until they learn to "fish" (acquire customers) for themselves.
 - The Weight Loss Analogy: Instead of discussing exercise science, agree that the goal is to make the prospect like working out more than watching TV.
 - The Diet Analogy: Instead of a meal plan, focus on the iterative process of finding healthy foods the prospect actually enjoys so they don't have to rely on unsustainable willpower.

III. The 3A Framework of Reframing

Reframing is defined as the one to three sentences said after a prospect says anything other than "yes" to increase the likelihood of a sale. The 3A Framework provides a structured way to handle any statement or question.

- Acknowledge: Build rapport by repeating what the prospect said. This makes them feel heard and buys the salesperson time to process the objection.
- Associate: This is the most critical step. Associate the prospect's question or hesitation with the behavior of the most successful, rational, or high-achieving clients. For example, if they ask about certifications, say: "That's an amazing question; it shows you're a rational person making a serious decision". This turns a step away from the sale into a step toward it.
- Ask (The Attack): Once the frame is shifted, ask a question that "attacks" the underlying premise of their objection. If they ask about certifications, ask: "Which certifications are you looking for specifically?". Often, prospects ask questions they don't actually know the answer to, and this puts the control back in the salesperson's hands.

IV. The Five Rules of Ethical Reframing

To use the 3A Framework effectively and ethically, the sources outline five key rules:

Rule 1: The person asking the questions is in control. As soon as a salesperson starts answering a barrage of questions, they are on defense. You must "breadcrumb" the prospect toward the logical solution. Never ask, "Do you have any questions?" as this invites objections and gives the prospect control.

Rule 2: You cannot catch smoke. A salesperson should "be like smoke"—impossible to argue with because they only ask questions. You must never win an argument and lose a sale. If a prospect says something vague like "I need to think about it," ask for the specific variables or concerns they are weighing.

Rule 3: Tell them what their question means. Use your expertise to define the prospect's intent. For example, if they mention they already have an advisor, reframe it by saying that 90% of your best clients already had one, which means they are already past the initial learning curve.

Rule 4: Use "Straw Men" for tough truths. If you need to deliver a harsh truth (e.g., "you're lazy" or "your priorities are wrong"), don't say it directly to the prospect. Use a "straw man" or a "foil".

- The "Earlier Today" Foil: "I had someone earlier today ask that same thing, can I share what I told them?"
- The Successful Customer Foil: "You remind me of Sarah, who was also worried about X but eventually found that Y was the real issue".
- The Authority Appeal: "It's funny you ask that, [CEO Name] just mentioned this morning that..."

Rule 5: Retain childlike curiosity. Always seek to understand rather than to beat the prospect. Use a simple "Huh?" to buy time and de-escalate tension. The goal is to make the prospect "right" in their decision to buy.

V. The Psychology of "NO" and High-Ticket Closings

The sources highlight that "Yes" often makes people feel vulnerable, while "No" makes them feel safe and autonomous.

- Yes-Based Questions: These are common but can be hard to get because they require a high level of agreement (e.g., "Does that sound great?").
- Neutral Questions: These rely on reciprocity and fairness. The "Fair Enough" close is a powerful tool: "What if we did X instead, fair enough?"
- No-Based Questions: These allow the prospect to agree while feeling they are protecting themselves.
 - "Would you be opposed to moving forward today?"
 - "Would it be completely unreasonable for us to get started?"
 - "Are you against knocking out the paperwork now?"

VI. Advanced Practical Scenarios

The sources provide specific scripts for common objections:

- The Spouse Objection: Acknowledge it is sensible to talk to a spouse, then ask: "What parts do you think they wouldn't like?". This brings the conversation back to the actual obstacles within the sale.
- The Timing Objection: Acknowledge that timing is tough, associate it with success stories who think the same way, and then ask: "What would make it a good time?".
- The "Secretary" Analogy: If a prospect asks technical questions you aren't qualified for, explain that asking you is like asking a heart surgeon's secretary about the surgery—you need to look "under the hood" (start the service) to give an ethical answer.
- The Direct Confrontation: When a prospect is hesitating late in the call, ask: "What are you afraid of?". This cuts through the "smoke screens" and gets to the emotional core of the decision.

VII. Final Ethics and Mindset

The ultimate goal of sales is to help qualified prospects "pull their head out of their ass" so they can make a decision that helps them. If you truly believe your product is the solution, you have an ethical obligation to ask as many times as necessary to get the prospect to see the truth. Sales should be a "dance" or "seduction" based on consent, never a fight. By focusing on the human being and their fears rather than the product features, you become a guide in their journey.
